These ideas might be great for someone else, someone new to the work force, who lives close to or in a major city. For my circumstances a lot of these ideas just don't pan out, I live too far away from the city and I'm mature enough to look stupid doing many of these things. Some of the ideas were a little insulting such as having a yard sale, selling your CDs, entering a contest and applying for a grant -- as if anyone needing money has not already had some of these brilliant ideas and there a many more along this same vein. Joining the National Guard is something you would plan to do if you had this particular desire- like joining the army or becoming a pilot- these types of ideas are life commitments, not easy ways to make money. Some of the ideas take some specific talent such as becoming a DJ, drawing cartoons, drawing Manga (I'd say these were "grasping at straws to fill space ideas"). Some were absolutely absurd-- "Get a Divorce" comes to mind. Many of the ideas would cost a fair amount of money, three examples are to become a hypnotist, belly dancer or pet taxidermist, it usually is not free and if you aim to be any good at these things or want any credibility you might have to spend a good amount of time in training. In all fairness to the author, the book seems well researched and is easy to use, I also like the way it is laid out-- you can work your way through the ideas (providing they are sane ideas) and mark them, add some notes- the concept of the book is great, the substance is somewhat lacking. Buy if you can find a good CHEAP copy, it might be worth one or two ideas you really had not thought of on your own and the rest of the book might be good for a laugh.0
